

The town of Riquewihr

The town of Riquewihr, one of the "Most Beautiful Villages in France" (Plus Beaux Villages de France), lies in a vale that is open to the east at the outlet of the Sembach River; towards the west, a vast state forest at an altitude of more than 900 m forms the background to this site.

Riquewihr is flanked to the north and to the south by the Vosges foothills planted with vines which produce the Major Vintages of Schoenenbourg and Sporen, which were already being mentioned in the Middle Ages. The town has prospered over the centuries, especially during the 16th century, thanks to its vineyards and to its wine trade for which it was famous throughout Europe.

The fortified town of Riquewihr is protected by twin walls. The old town retains a very dense urban fabric: houses erected in the 15th to the 18th centuries provide an exceptional wealth of architecture. The town spread beyond the ramparts during the second half of the 19th century.

A little history...

In the 8th century, a freeborn owner called Richo appears to have worked vineyards on the site. He gave his name to "Richo villa" which then became Riquewihr. Owned by the counts of Eguisheim-Dabo during the 5th and 6th centuries, Riquewihr, with its seigneurie, then passed to the counts of Horbourg who, in 1291, surrounded the town with its first defence fortifications. A 1320 document mentions the status of "town" of Riquewihr for the first time. In 1324, the counts of Horbourg sold the seigneurie of Riquewihr to count Ulrich of Wurttemberg.

In 1397, count Eberhard II of Wurttemberg became betrothed to the heiress of the county of Montbéliard, Henriette de Montfaucon whom he married 10 years later. From then on, the seigneurie of Riquewihr belonged to the counts of Wurttemberg-Montbéliard. In the meantime, in 1495, the county of Wurttemberg was raised to the rank of duchy.

In 1534, count Georges of Wurttemberg allowed the Zwingli (Swiss) inspired Reformation into his lands; in 1559, duke Christophe of Wurttemberg introduced the teachings of the German reformer Luther, in order to safeguard the religious unity of his possessions on both banks of the Rhine river. During the political and religious Thirty Years War (1618-1648), Riquewihr suffered badly: pillaging, ransoms, epidemics, famine, death, destruction etc. As the French influence extended to include Alsace, Riquewihr was placed under royal authority in 1680 (Louis XIV) while remaining the property of the Wurttemberg-Montbéliard family.

When the French Revolution broke out in 1789, the inhabitants of Riquewihr supported the French Republic. The dukes of Wurttemberg-Montbéliard were thrown out under the Treaty of Paris (1796) and Riquewihr permanently became part of France.

- The wine grower houses: over the stone built ground floor housing the press and covering the basement cellar, there would be one or two further storeys (depending on the owner's fortunes and requirements) which would usually be timber framed; only the wealthy burghers had the means to built the whole house of stone. So, in Riquewihr, timber framed houses alternate with stone built houses.
- Timber frame symbol systems
A geometric timber frame would ensure that the houses remained stable. The frame featured three motifs:
 - the Saint-Andrew cross, regarded as a symbol of protection;
 - the sella curulus whose presence on a façade showed that the house belonged to a notable;
 - the "Mann", the outline of a standing man, expressing virility.
- Trade emblems
On door lintels or on the arches over the entrances to houses, we find trade emblems which include, among others, that of the:
 - cooper: a mallet and two crossed clamps used to hold the staves when the hoops were fitted (see point 16 of the itinerary),
 - tailor: symbolised by a pair of scissors (see point 11 of the itinerary).
- The oriels: one or more bow fronted levels on a house façade, providing the occupant with more daylight and a better view of the street (see points 3 15 16 17 18 of the itinerary).
